78.                  It helps in all areas of life to have a plan (get out of here dad...) ↵
79.                  and it's no different in chess. ↵
80.                  Having a plan and sticking to it rubs off in your life away from the board, and having clear plans ↵

86.              Having a plan is one thing, but to have it survive first contact with the 'enemy' (or a real life setting) is quite another. ↵
87.              In chess, tactics are an important component of your overall strategy. To win the war you will have to win many any given time means you have to constantly evaluate your current position on the board.↵

95.             Real life example - our hunter-gathering ancestor's ability to observe their given situation really helped them not die. ↵ 96.             Luckily the stakes in chess aren't so high your day-to-day life.↵

103.             Having observed the board and (hopefully) evaluated correctly, you will have a good idea which pieces are active, or have potential, ↵
104.             and which do not. Then your aim should be to trade your 'bad' pieces for your opponent's 'good'. Easy right?↵

109.         There are many ways to start a game of chess, depending on the first sequence of moves. ↵ 110.             The top players have been theorising for centuries, and the recent addition of computers has upped the stakes. ↵ 111.             However there is good news if you're not so hot on strategy and tactics, you can out memorise your opponent! ↵ 112.             If you're a perfectionist then you might want to avoid chess or risk starving alone in your room, but for the rest of us a little bit of memorisation will help a lot.↵
